

As you might imagine, that's a lot to keep track of! Even if you are dealing with just one species of animals, say dogs, for instance, keeping up with the different breeds presents a problem if they aren't grouped by similar traits or characteristics. There are relatively small numbers of dogs (340 breeds) in comparison to the total number of animal species, but that is still a large number. Using a classification system makes the job easier.

There are so many species of animals globally without an organized system of classification, scientists would not know what species exist or are now extinct. So it is easy to see why scientists are interested in keeping track of all the species alive in some organized form. An Animal Classification Chart, like the example shown above, is one way that scientists and biologists track changes in the population of different species and organize their work.

Vertebrates & Invertebrates

Animal Classification Charts are hierarchical representations of species by their traits and characteristics. A hierarchy is where the highest order of representation appears on the top and the lowest the bottom. Think of an upside-down triangle. The top of the Animal Classification Chart is the Kingdom because it is the broadest descriptive category. Each layer of the triangle is where scientists have refined the descriptive class to be more specific. The narrow point in the chart is the Animal Species by name. If we were looking for a particular animal and had a description of the animal, we simply keep narrowing our choice by following the characteristics listed in each level. This is also known as a taxonomic rank.

If we are looking for an animal and we are not sure if it is an invertebrate or a vertebrate, we first have to know what these words mean. An invertebrate is an animal without a backbone. A vertebrate is the opposite, an animal with a backbone. We can narrow our search by looking at the next level of classification known as Phylum or Phyla.
