Lewandowski, Douglas A.

Olson, David H. Johnson, 1980 This report describes an algorithm developed to calculate the performance of Claude Cycle ocean thermal energy conversion OTEC systems The algorithm treats each component of the system separately and then interfaces them to form a complete system allowing a component to be changed without changing the rest of the algorithm Two components that are subject to change are the evaporator and condenser For this study we developed mathematical models of a channel flow evaporator and both a horizontal jet and spray director contact condenser The algorithm was then programmed to run on SERI's CDC 7600 computer and used to calculate the effect on performance of deaerating the warm and cold water streams before entering the evaporator and condenser respectively This study indicates that there is no advantage to removing air from these streams compared with removing the air from the condenser Optical Networking A.
