

The chart to the right illustrates how Integrity servers compare to HP 9000 servers on the second set of attributes. Between 30% and 40% of respondents rate Integrity better than HP 9000 on attributes such as ease of set-up, system reliability, and ease of use. More respondents view the two server platforms as being the same on these attributes. This is not surprising because all of these attributes (as well as ease of management shown on the previous chart) are influenced by the operating system software. Since both systems are running the same HP-UX operating system, it is logical to expect the two systems will behave similarly on these operational attributes.

The one item of note concerns the availability of software applications for Integrity servers running HP-UX. Seventy percent (70%) of respondents rate application availability on Integrity as the same, or better, than HP 9000. However, 30% rate Integrity as worse than HP 9000 in terms of application availability. This is not surprising since HP 9000 servers have been available for decades compared to 5+ years for Integrity servers. In a separate question TechWise Research asked respondents how satisfied they are with the applications available for HP-UX Integrity. Eighty-five percent (85%) of respondents (not shown in graph) are satisfied with application availability on Integrity. This indicates that even though there are more applications available for HP 9000, most of the applications that are being used by respondents are also available on Integrity servers. According to HP, as of June 2007 there are 3,981 third-party applications available for HP-UX Integrity.
