

F4A construction

First lets have a look at the four speed version as the base is the same for four speed and five speed version. The transmission housing consists of three main parts made from light alloy, the bell housing, the main body and the rear cover. The valve body is installed at the side of the transmission in order to reduce the height. The valve body cover is made from steel. The tightness of the housing is achieved by a special liquid gasket. Some of the Hivtec transmissions were equipped with two oil filters, one installed internally and another one located outside of the housing. This sub filter is very similar to an engine oil filter, it is a part of the regular maintenance to replace this filter while the internal filter is not part of regular maintenance. Please take care not to confuse the AT oil filter with an engine oil filter, as their internal construction is different. In order to allow an easy identification, the AT filter has AT only printed on top. This outer filter was deleted from January 2001 production onwards. The oil pump is a conventional trochoid type made from light alloy. The F4A4...incorporates the following clutches and brakes: Under drive clutch, low reverse brake, second brake, overdrive clutch and the reverse clutch. The function of these elements is to connect or to hold certain parts of the planetary gear sets, in order to achieve the different gear ratios. Each clutch or brake can be applied individually by a dedicated solenoid valve which are incorporated in the valve body.
