

INTRODUCTION

FIG. 1. Schematic diagram illustrating the experimental design.

Abstract: Individuals with a history of suicidal ideation and behavior are at an elevated risk for future suicidal ideation and behavior. This study examined the effectiveness of a 12-week, manualized, group-based intervention for suicidal ideation and behavior. The intervention was designed to address the needs of individuals with a history of suicidal ideation and behavior. The intervention was evaluated using a randomized controlled trial design. The results of the study indicated that the intervention was effective in reducing suicidal ideation and behavior. The intervention was also found to be acceptable to participants. The results of this study suggest that the intervention may be a useful tool for the treatment of suicidal ideation and behavior.

The first stage of such research is coupled with a search for the best fit between the two models under study in the data. The data required for this search need not have a known functional form, but they do require an assumption of stationarity. The second step is the derivation of exchange rate rules to be used in a policy simulation exercise.
